

I believe this lecture is really important and touching, it's a must to whoever has the time to view it. The reason for this is it touches on our earliest times of wonderment, a time of dreams at their earliest stages. Childhood dreams will fizzle out and die, or they are worked upon and reinforced, no matter how tough the barrier it's achievable, and this is what Randy Pausch was trying to tell us is that we can do it, we just need the right push. Though I can't relate to the message of achieving childhood dreams to the fullest I still believe I'm able to build somewhat off of those old dreams. I've done this by changing and turning down different paths of life to get where I am now. I've been able to build off the dreams of wanting to become an artist, working on my creative side in order to achieve what I truly want, what I really want to do. That is also of absolute importance, to do what you yourself want as some people including me have done so much for others that we just needed time to think for ourselves for once. Randy really drove home this lecture, as if he had a choice either with it being his last, he wanted to show the world that we should stay determined and real to ourselves.
